YOUR CORNER OF HISTORY: THE D&H CABOOSE

The Delaware & Hudson Railroad Caboose 35800-series was built by the D&H company in 1913. The 35800-series was the first eight wheeled, all-wood caboose placed into service on the D&H Railroad.

The cabooses had "arch bar" trucks, double hung sash windows on the sides and ends, wood sheathing without the iron straps at both ends, and were supported by a steel underframe. The "little red caboose" soon became a familiar sight at the end of a train appearing on freights from Wilkes-Barre, PA to Rouses Point, NY and beyond into Canada.

Even though, at their conception, the red cabooses were used all over the D&H rail system their early-20th Century construction could not withstand the technological advances of the second Industrial Revolution. New raw materials, chiefly iron and steel were used in the production of huge articulated steam locomotives that pushed train cars out of Binghamton, NY and Scranton, PA. The old wooden cabooses were on occasion crushed and destroyed by the constant shoving of the powerful locomotives. As a result, the 35800-series cars were later limited to service north of Albany, NY where the big steam "pushers" were seldom used.
